Text "Chinese moss may alleviate Alzheimer's disease".

A traditional Chinese herbal remedy might be effective in treating Alzheimer's disease. Experts on the disease looked at the research in China and studies in the United States. Based on the results, they believe the harmless herbal remedy may be even more effective than the two drugs that doctors use now to treat the disease. Alzheimer's disease affects as many as four million elderly Americans and twelve million people worldwide. Common symptoms are dementia and memory loss. There is no known cure.

The traditional remedy, called Qian Ceng Ta, comes from a moss. It has been used for centuries in China to treat fever and inflammation. The remedy has another positive effect. It slows the breakdown of acetylcholine, which is a chemical in the brain that helps it work normally.

Alzheimer's sufferers often experience memory loss and are confused about what is happening around them. This is the result of acetylcholine breakdown.

The two drugs that are now used to treat Alzheimer's patients improve the way the brain works. But they can also cause stomach and liver problems. Qian Ceng Ta seems even more effective than the drugs at treating the disease. And it has none of the bad effects on the body.

The traditional remedy Qian Ceng Ta has been used to treat dementia in China. Doctors there prescribe it to their patients. Reports from that country suggest that as many as 100,000 Alzheimer's patients have had their symptoms lessened, according to Alan Kozikowski, Ph. D., Georgetown University.

Kozikowski first separated and studied the herbal compound in 1991.
